The last triangular grass plots stretched out before him reminded him of a grassy golf course. A thought came to him that perhaps he would never see it again if it seemed more dear to him than that. The gentle murmur of the fountain recalled the fountain at his home, and the dear little girl with whom he played. The large bed of jonquills made him think of that first spring day when he had first seen her. He had never seen these flowers. He had told her that that her hair was the same color as the yellow jonquills, and then he wondered if she would like them.

It was getting darker; he could scarcely see the objects in front of him. The tall tower of the Madison Square Hotel, the only one of the city with electric lights, alone gave him his bearings. He remembered how she had told him one day in one of her serious moments that she would never marry. He told her that he would never marry, too. That day he had decided. He determined to enlist that night, but he left, with a sigh, his pleasant surroundings and his sweet memories.

On the water, however, it was quite a different affair. The spectacle recalled the pictures of old marine operations when armed crews in small boats and boarding parties, bristling with muskets and cutlasses, were familiar features of naval warfare. In the offing, steaming slowly to overcome the current, lay the huge transports, their decks crowded with men eager to exchange the lksome confinement of the ship for the freedom of the ramp. Further out, the fleet of gunboats, stripped for action and ready to repel any interference with the landing, with keen-eyed look-outs in every fighting-top to watch the shore as well as the

to be Jehovah's ambassador to the Court of Ahab? If so, he places himself unreservedly at the disposal of the Almighty. So, of his own will, with use of his own judgment, in normal manner he becomes Israel's reformer. Some scholars have been annoyed at the abruptness of Elijah's appearance in the narrative. The Jerusalem Talmud fills in the apparent hiatus with an imaginary conversation between Elijah and Ahab. It is gratuitous. Abruptness is in appearance only. From St. James we the day—the stock market must still be described as dead, though the volume of transactions somewhat exceeded that of yesterday. There was still no marked evidence of either a general or a broad one, though many recently inactive stocks were brought forward into the active list. There was however, a steady and quiet absorption of the market, and the usual efforts to cheapen efforts to advance prices. The Vanderbilts were conspicuous as was the case yesterday and the buying, especially of the New York Central, was large. The market advanced sharply and the buying was rather more conspicuous than is usual for this stock in the New York market. The coalers were an exception to the strength in that they were not only in the general depression, known to exist in the anthracite trade, but also on reports of deep cuts in the selling price of coal and of prospects of a conflict of rates.

The coalers, however, were not added to the advancing tendency in the market. Prices in the group crumbled away without much resistance. Reading first performed the worst, dropping to 100, and the New York Central, Erie points and Delaware & Hudson. This formidable break in prices had little effect in the general list, scarcely any stock losing over a half and part of the loss being made up by a recovery which was remarkably firm in the face of the slump in coalers. Much was heard in Wall street of the CHICAGO—Poor threshing returns caused short supply of wheat advanced prices for the wheat pit to-day. July elapsed 1½c higher and September gained 5/8c. Corn and oats are unchanged. Pork and ribs lost 5c each and lard declined 10c. Some times last wheat has had alternating days of weakness and strength with as much regularity as an intermittent fever. To-day was no exception. Fearful of a rise in the price of wheat, the continued light receipts strengthened prices at the start. The general returns from the threshing of wheat as reported from the country to Chicago commission houses were disappointing. The total wheat yield added to this there were a good many apparently well founded crop damage reports which started shorts covering. There was not much wheat for sale and the market for wheat advanced prices. The movement of new wheat was still small and the demand for old somewhat more depressing. Foreign markets were weaker. Chicago received twenty carloads, and St. Louis, Kansas City, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth got forty-eight, against one hundred and twenty-two the year previous. The visible supply

Oats displayed moderate strength in sympathy with wheat. There was an improved cash demand. July opened 16
